'Il take him to some quiet corner, out of the way, and I'll shake my finger in his face, and call him all sorts of names. The two quotations which we have given are air specimens of the whole of the "Hundred Lessons," from a perusal of which, more especially if with a teacher and with a view to study a better idea of the Chinese may be obtained than from reading half the descriptions which have hitherto issued from the Press. Of the more technical portion of the work it s almost needless for us to speak at great length in a general review. Mr. Wade's stand. ng as a Chinese scholar is a guarantee for its efficiency, and we may state that no pains have been spared in the explanation of details. The translations, for instance, in the "Hundred Lessons" are, as above noticed; a perfect rendaring of the sense; but individual words and characters; special uses of particles, or peculiar turns of idiom are all very conscientiously pointed out in elaborate aunotations. The Tone Exercises, with which the work is supplemented, will form a great assistance in mastering one of the most difficult parts in the suggested this mode of distinguishing words. To those who desire to obtain a finency in speaking. The exercises which Mr. Wade has compiled will be of great value. The system of numbering the tones, in place of distinguishing them by signs, we deem an improvement. We are dispossed somewhat to differ with the view given by Mr. Wade respecting the desirability of sys. sematically practising the various tones at an tarly period of study, as being somewhat likely to overburden the memory. A constant watchfulness for the ordence of his teacher's voice. combined with the knowledge that these distinctions have to be observed, will be sufficient to place the student upon his guard; and after a time, as he becomes familiar with various words of apparently similar pronunciation, he may with advantage commence the distinctions of tone, which he will find he has unconsciously mastered to a great extent. We cannot conclude our review of this work. without noticing the courteous manner in which His Excellency the Governor has been the author alludes to the services rendered him by Mr. Bismark, of the Prussian Legation, and Messrs Mowat and Jumicson, British Cona naval stashen will be necessary.
